Lupin3 seems very popular in Italy and France.

there was a recent [City Hunter] movie in France.

I don't want to say anything about the Germans, because I am one, and I had my special experiences with the militant defenders of VHS-only,

but what is to see about translations and community support, Russians and Arabs are big fans.

Russians have a different Blu-Ray Disc Region Code than US, Japan or Europa. So I don't think that there is a big anime business there possible.

Do you have some reason to relieve that region-switchable Blu-Ray players are unobtainable in Russia?

No, but I think, for an original Russian anime business like Funimation in the US the Russian anime market is not big enough, and the pockets of the customers there are not so deep. But I am not sure about that.

Well, I am a German, and I prefer to buy anime blue-rays in Japan or the USA. You see, what I meant?

Well, there are several german DVD/BD publishers specializing in anime and no less than 5 licensed streaming services, so anime business can't be running THAT bad over here.

Unfortunately, there is very little community activity and also very little TV exposure. And many long-term fans do prefer to import their stuff from the USA, because german DVD/BD releases tend to be late, overpriced, and rather random in terms of the titles being covered.

Both TV series did air on small private TV stations once around 2001-2002 in germany. But did they did not gain much attention back then and never re-surfaced afterwards.

Yes, unlicensed distribution is considered illegal - like almost everywhere else in the world.

But you have to be rather careless to be caught. Also, you will only get fined if they catch you while redistributing copies (e.g. through bittorrent). Just watching is only formally illegal, but the damage is way too low for any rights holder to consider legal action against the users of an illegal service.

So, no, germany is NOT particular strict about this.
