I have long felt Moorcock to be mostly empty of interesting ideas in his pursuit of his "new wave" ego trips. I surprised myself when I picked up a book of his called \The Swords Trilogy/ recently, and surprised myself even more when I read it all (400 pages) and enjoyed it. It is rather good Swords and Sorcery stuff with a believable hero, an interesting set of quests, and a rather neat tie-up-the-strings ending. It also has a particularly believable bit where Moorcock brings in some heros from previous books to solve a difficult problem. A fine airplane read (The Swords Trilogy, Berkley medallion, 1977, ISBN 0-425-03468-2)

Subject: Star Trek, the command console

I have come to the conclusion that the command console prefix code feature was added sometime between the M5 incident ("The Ultimate Computer") and "The Wrath of Kahn".

I just saw a repeat of "The Doomsday Machine", where Kirk stays on the crippled Constellation until the last second, steering it down the planet eaters throat.

If the command console prefix existed at that point in time, they should have been able to steer the ship by remote control. But, then again, that wouldn't be exciting enough.

(P.S. That brings up another point. Cmmdr. Decker dies in an attempt to destroy the thing, and his son, Will Decker is "absorbed" by V'ger in "Star Trek: The Motion Picture." What will the next Star Trek movie be? Why, "The Revenge of Mrs. Decker", of course.

Obviously, revenge would only be appropriate if the Jedi in question had/was succumbed/ing to the dark side of the force. How many Jedi Knights do we know who have this problem?
