The SE/30s I've rescued have come with a lot of floppies, and I'd like to back the ones that are readable to my MacBook as insurance. How do people recommend doing this?

I'm assuming that I can plug a USB floppy drive into the MacBook, but are there any special considerations on the software side?

Thanks,

julian

It seems to me that it wasn't that easy when I had to do it, but I forget

why. (then again, it could be that I didn't get that drive until later, but I don't think so.

I ended up copying from the Classic to disk (in MS format?), and then I think I had to boot my FreeBSD machine off of a linux installation to read that, and I want to say it then went onto a USB zip disk which then went to the mac.

Fortunately, it was just a few files.

I think that was also the last time I booted the FreeBSD machine.

Ahh, now I see: the USB floppy is physically mounted in the freebsd machine . . .

If they're High Density with the write protect tab and a second hole opposite it, you can use the USB floppy drive. To be able to write to a floppy you need OS X 10.5 or earlier. Apple decided that with 10.6 you would no longer be allowed to do that.

If the disks only have the write protect hole, they're Mac's own special format from heck, unreadable by anything except old Beige Macs - or certain old and practically unobtainable hardware like a Central Point Option Board or a Catweasel for PCs and Amigas. Easiest way to test is plug the USB floppy into your MacBook and pop in a high density Mac formatted floppy. If it's a good disk and mounts on the Desktop, congrats, you can read them and should be able to make DMGs of them. I dunno if not writing to floppies in 10.6 and up is hard blocked at the system level or if it's only the higher level layer of OS X that doesn't do it - and 3rd party software can.

This ain't new. Apple did this before when they decided to exterminate the 400K and 800K formats. Floppy Disk Compatibility and Incompatibility in the Mac World if they are not HD disks with two holes in them you will have to use a machine that is compatible with that format, make a disk image, then transfer that image using various methods (serial, network whatever)

You may find an external USB floppy drive will not read older Apple disks.

Also, it may be best to create disk images in a format usable on the SE/30.

For those reasons, I would recommend using the internal floppy drive of the SE/30 to create disk images on the SE/30 hard drive, which then could be copied to an external SCSI device (CD writer or hard disk), or even exported via serial port if you have the right hardware and plenty of patience.

I would recommend using ShrinkWrap to create the disk images.

(search <http://www.macintoshrepository.org>)

IIRC ShrinkWrap v2.1 was freeware, ShrinkWrap v3.5 was a later (shareware?) release with more bells and whistles.

For hardware bridge between the old world and new world Macs, I use a WallStreet PowerBook. It can run Systems from 8.0 through to OSX 10.4.11 (Tiger), has two "expansion bays" which can accept hot-pluggable CD, hard drive or floppy drive modules. You can boot the machine from an inserted CD or hard drive module containing whatever OS you wish. It has SCSI-2, Ethernet, and serial ports built in. It also has two PCMCIA card slots allowing addition of USB and firewire ports.

The disks were just standard Double-Density floppies; the format was just as "special" as that for HD disks--PCs didn't recognize those either, but you could read PC disks of both persuasions if you had the right extensions.

On a Mac floppy drive, yes. A Mac drive is capable of reading both 720K and 1440K disks, as well as both 800K and 1440K Mac disks.

But a PC floppy drive is physically incapable of reading Mac 800K disks. Why? Because they use different numbers of sectors for different tracks, much like most hard drives. This was done by varying the spindle speed. PC floppy drives have a single-speed motor, and also can't arbitrarily change the symbol rate to compensate.

I believe it's possible to convince an Amiga to read 800K disks, as they have more flexible floppy hardware than a typical PC. But by far the easiest way is to simply use a real Mac. If nothing else, you can take a Disk Copy image of the 800K disk and put it on a 1440K disk, and by that means archive it on a PC.

I have tried this but you could install brew followed by ddrescue. I am quite confident that ddrescue can work with floppies. It essentially will read the disc as a device and store it as a dmg. I am not sure this answers your question but it is worth investigating the virtues of ddrescue.

Subject: Re: Copying Floppies to MacBook...

Working with older disk images, cited from http://www.earlymacintosh.org/disk_images.html

You can format 800K (2DD: double-sided, double-density) disks as 400K (1DD: single-sided, double-density) disks with no problems. Note that you should use Double Density (DD) media. One reliable source for new disks is OldSoftware.com. You should not use High Density (HD) media. HD disks are not entirely stable when formatted as DD. If you must use HD media, then it should be a disk that has never been formatted. See here (p. 14) for details.

For System 6, you should use Disk Copy 4.2 to work with 400K/800K disks and images. This is ideal, since System 6 can read/write 400K disks, which normally use the Macintosh File System (MFS) format. 800K disks use a different format: the Hierarchical File System (HFS). System 6 is fluent in both formats. [It is possible to format 400K disks using HFS, but they can't be used as startup disks. See here.]

System 7 is not ideal, since it does not handle the MFS format properly. This is discussed in Apple Knowledge Base article 9502, System 7.x: Limitations on Use of 400k Disks. Nevertheless, you can use Disk Copy 4.2 to work with 400K/800K disks and images with no problems. Disk Copy 6.3.3 works perfectly with 800K disks and images. It allows you to make compressed images and mount images on the Desktop.

With OS 7.6, Apple dropped support for writing to the MFS format. With OS 8, it dropped MFS support altogether. However, any Macintosh with a built-in floppy drive can use Disk Copy 4.2 to make 400K/800K disks from images and Disk Copy 6.3.3 to make 800K disks from images, even in OS 9. For more on this, see Sonic Purity.

Mac OS X can open 800K disk images. Read-only access to MFS disk images is available for OS X 10.4, via MFSLives. See the Read Me for detailed information. [Not for beginners!]

Hi Brent

I am still interested, I thought I was waiting for you actually. I didn't want to be rude and nag you.

Could you send me a few photos and a short description and I hope the price is not too high because I am in Poland, Europe so shipping will be another killer but let me know please. Thanks for coming back to me.

Hi Brent

Thank you for preparing them but indeed I did not get them.

You can use google drive if you prefer.

Kind regards

Take a close look at the To and Cc addresses on your e-mails. Are they going directly to Alex, or to vintage-macs@googlegroups.com?

I can in fact see the attached photo. This means it's taking up 1.3MB in my inbox - and in everyone else's too. Basic netiquette suggests not attaching files that aren't of general interest to the list to list messages.

Hello Brent

Yes I did receive the one photo.

Just so you know, this thread is now occupying 13.2MB of every list subscriber's disk space and download bandwidth allowance.

Hi Brent

Great photos, the machine looks good.

Let me know how much you are asking for it. Maybe better to send me a private message though.

Cheers!

To second Jonathan - I appreciate the fact that this list can connect folks - I still have a love my SE/30 too - but would also appreciate if you could take personal business off-list. The Nettiquette guide does specifically state no attachments, and there are any number of other decent ways to share photos that aren't much harder and won't annoy folks. :) 13.2MB doesn't sound like a lot on a hard drive but adds up quickly for those on mobile or those with limited webmail space, and is also just a lot of extra mail clutter to deal with.

Hi Brent

I downloaded all the images to my local hard drive. Feel free to delete the message you so kindly posted. To everyone else, thank you for your support and help and my apologies for the long thread.

Brent, you can PM me, maybe we should take care of our deal off-line.

Kindest regards

—Alex
