It was an amusing film, but was certainly unreasonable. I mean, would you ever rig up a computer you had programmed so that you couldn't turn it off and couldn't bypass it in any manner?

By the way, this was one of the films that we screened during the early production phases of the first "Star Trek" movie (I was working for the firm that was doing the special effects at the time) and it helps to show where poor old "Vejur" got some of his inspiration.

(Don't blame me for ST-I! I thought the script sucked.)
